

Image Permissions Guide & Template

Copyright is a legal right defined and enforced by applicable laws and authorised agencies. Its precise terms and processes are determined differently depending on the relevant legal jurisdiction.

Copyright is the exclusive and assignable legal privilege of creators to the use, commercial exploitation and publication of literary, artistic or musical material. Artworks are protected by copyright for the lifetime of the creator plus seventy years after their death (in the USA) or fifty years after their death (in Lebanon).¹

Copyright may be transferred to another person or corporate body and it may be licensed independently of the ownership of the artwork. After the artist's death, copyright is inherited like other asserts. Thus, unless other arrangements are made, it generally descends to the nearest living relative. In some cases, copyright is transferred to a non-profit foundation, charity or other institution or corporation to promote or exploit the artist's legacy. In such cases, the copyright holder will often expect permission be requested and fees paid before permission to publish is granted.

Some contemporary artists release images of their artworks under a creative commons license. In which case, authors do not need to request permission, but should provide proof of the license.

In general, with modern and contemporary art, copyright is assumed to reside with the artist or their heirs. However, museums, galleries and owners of artworks are granted or assume permission to publish (and to authorise permission to publish) images of artworks for the purposes of advertising, research, critique and so forth. They usually grant such permission for free, and will distribute a 'press pack' of photographs for this purpose. Authors may begin with this assumption and request permission to reproduce images from the gallery or collection where they saw the artwork. However, it is ultimately the author's responsibility to ensure they have been given permission to reproduce the artwork by the copyright holder or by someone authorised by the copyright holder to grant such permission.

The copyright of photography taken on behalf of galleries or museums is usually transferred or licensed to the institution for their use, including by third parties. You should request permission from galleries and museums to reproduce photographs you've taken on their property, regardless of what was captured within the photograph.

In a precedent set by US law and which rapidly became an assumed standard: photography of artworks that are merely a 'slavish reproduction' of the artwork for accurate reproduction, and which are not themselves creative, are not protected by copyright.²

Images that do not have permission to be reproduced will not be published.

This document does not constitute legal advice. The university, its offices and agents, is not liable for accuracy, content, completeness, legality or reliability.

¹ Lebanese law No. 75 of 1999 on the Protection of Literary and Artistic Property provides copyright protection for the life of the author and fifty years after the year of their death (VIII.1).

² Bridgeman Art Library, Ltd. v. Corel Corp., 36 F. Support. 2d 191 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

Template email:

Dear Sir / Madam,

I am seeking to acquire permission to reproduce the following images for both print and online publication. Online permission must be in perpetuity (without time or download limitations) for an article/review that has been accepted for publication in the Beirut Art Review:

- [details of the image for reproduction] ...
- [details of the image for reproduction] ...

The Beirut Art Review is published by the American University of Beirut Press, and is supported by the Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan al-Nahyan Chair for Arabic and Islamic Studies. It is a scholarly, non-profit, open-access and peer-reviewed journal with a print run of less than five hundred. As a scholarly journal, the Beirut Art Review does not offer any remuneration to authors. It is published in an electronic (web-based) version and maintained as an electronic archive after initial publication. I am therefore seeking permission for both the printed and electronic versions of the journal.

Thank you.

Yours sincerely,

...